The New Era of Home Gym Design

Home fitness as we know it in the West started to appear sometime after World War II, and it's taken on a new primary role since all the gyms around the world closed due to the Covid-19 pandemic. Between January and March of 2020 in the US, sales of fitness equipment shot up 55% as lockdowns began.

In the first month of COVID-19 lockdowns alone, Americans increased their spending on online workouts by 125 percent. This is according to Cardlytics ad platform that partners with banks to track consumer spending, and purchases of at-home fitness equipment were 130% higher than they were the year prior.

The busy schedule and long hours of working, crowded fitness centers, and problems regarding vehicle parking have resulted in an increasing number of consumers actively inclining towards home workouts.

The home fitness equipment eliminates the inconvenience of commuting to a gym and are highly cost-effective in the long run. The small recurring cost incurred in transportation, workout equipment, trainer fees, and membership fees is a major factor promoting consumer inclination for home fitness equipment.
